The screenshot shows a journal article abstract from the journal 'Medicine, Health Care and Philosophy'. The title is 'Wrongful genetic connection: neither blood of my blood, nor flesh of my flesh'. The authors are Vera Lúcia Carapeto Raposo. The abstract discusses the use of reproductive techniques and the eventual reproductive negligence from the provider of reproductive services, leading to situations where intended parents are deprived of raising a child genetically connected to them. Courts have been dealing with cases of those for years, but have not provided a clear answer (the present paper). The paper aims to measure the damage to the loss of genetic connection. In 2017, for the first time, the Singapore High Court provided compensation for that damage, labelled "loss of genetic affinity" (ABC v. Thomson Medical Pte Ltd and Others [2017] SGCA 20). The paper will argue that the damage in question is the loss of genetic connection (wrongful genetic connection) and results from a violation of reproductive rights (and eventually also the right to found a family) because a key element of reproductive rights is to have children with whom we keep a genetic bond and raise them. The paper will explain why the arguments classically argued against such compensation are unfounded and it will argue for a compensation covering both patrimonial and non-patrimonial damages.

CRISPR-Cas9 and the Promise of a Better Future

Keywords: CRISPR-Cas9 gene editing; precautionary principle; European Union (EU); Council of Europe (CoE)

Abstract
Due to its simplicity, low cost and accuracy, CRISPR-Cas9 has become a promising new technique in the field of gene editing. However, despite its virtues, it is yet immune to scientific hazards and ethical legal concerns. These concerns have been used to justify opposition to genetic manipulation, and have led to one response that has come to a standstill on the precautionary principle. In Europe, the debate on the use of CRISPR-Cas9 has been limited to the Council of Europe, but very cautious towards gene editing. In this article, two arguments for the future legal framework of CRISPR-Cas9 are made. The first sat continued research will contribute to more scientific accuracy; thus, the precautionary principle should promote regulated research to achieve this aim. The second is that most of the legal and ethical concerns surrounding CRISPR-Cas9 are based on unfounded prejudice emanating from a mythical understanding of the human genome.
